It's been my go-to tool for diagramming during our team meetings since before we officially launched our site in 2013. It's been incredibly useful for prototyping and getting a quick visual of ideas, but it's also been a surprisingly powerful tool for collaboration. Today, I want to share how I use Excalidraw for that, and the benefits of using a visual collaboration tool like this. (If you'd like to get in touch about using Excalidraw for your team, drop me a line on my website) An example workflow So, to start, let's consider a typical situation for a team. You've all got an idea for a new feature, or a new project, or you've got a prototype you'd like to show to your clients. But it's probably a long shot. So, instead of writing it down in a text editor or a markdown document, it's time to get some inspiration from the web. Go to Google Images, and search for the keywords that best describe what you're trying to draw. Then, once you've found a picture that you like, press the "Use Image" button in the search box and navigate to that image, or go directly to the image's URL. Once you have the picture opened in Excalidraw, and you're ready to start drawing, you can open the tool directly from the image, or the browser will automatically save the image to your hard drive. In my experience, it's not uncommon for the image to be pretty large, so I'll typically open it in a new tab in the browser, and then navigate to the image's URL in the URL bar in the browser. If you're really keen, you can even open a copy of the image directly from the browser's URL bar, which is useful for referencing the image in another tab, or a document. Let's go back to the beginning of our workflow, now that we have the image loaded. Now that we've found the image we want to use, it's time to start drawing. For my workflow, it's generally easier to start with a simple sketch of the subject matter, before I start
